

The future of the United Nations in international peace and security

Credits: UN Photo/Stuart Price

The UN is currently finding its place in relation to contemporary conflicts and emerging types of threats to international peace and security. In this period of on-going reform, it is more important than ever to strengthen the debate about how the UN contributes to international peace and security.

The Centre for Military Studies in cooperation with the Danish UN Association and the Academic Council on the UN System invites to a conference on the future of the United Nations in international peace and security.

The conference will include panel debates with world leading scholars and practitioner experts and will have the keynote address delivered by former Deputy Secretary-General of the UN, Jan Eliasson.

Time and venue

Thursday, 17 January 2019, 09:30-16:30
Fællessalen, Christiansborg, Copenhagen

Programme

The conference will address the following themes

- The UN's position in the global order
- The UN's conflict management policies
- The UN reform efforts

The conference will include a political debate between the foreign policy spokespersons of the Danish political parties and be concluded with a hosted reception

Find the full programme and register here: <http://cms.polsci.ku.dk/events/>. Seats are limited.